The front door clicked and the visitor opened it to find a door at the end of the nall being held open welcomingly. He walked down the hall past a door labelled "Reception Room" and at the second door was a man with a heavy spade shaped brown beard, a thatch of brown hair, one batch of which hung down over one eye, and a reddish veined nose.

"Is this Dr. Vanderheide?" as ked the intruder. He was assured that it was gone other. Then at the door the young man explained the reason for his call. It seems that he is a student in Columbia it will be hed been "going out with the boys" of late. The doctor smiled a compresenting smile. But the young man is very anxious to have some sort of a degree to show his father when he goes back heem and he happened to see one of the doctor's postcards. The doctor told him to come right in and he would fix things up.

Dr. Vanderheide usbered his visitor into

Dr. Vanderheide ushered his visitor into Dr. Vanderheide ushered his visitor into a small room with a motto underneath a hirror standing out from the white wall. The motto said, "We are well met." On the wall opposite the motto was a diploma from the "Institute of Science" which said that Homan Vanderheide had received the degree of doctor of mechanotherapy from that institution. Under the diploma was a chest weight hung on the wall and by it attached to the wall was a board such as osteopaths use upon their patients. Also there were some square pieces of The passengers were safely landed and The passengers were safely landed and such as esteopaths use upon their patients. Also there were some square pieces of paper in a big frame which were headed New York University. The young man being near-sighted could not at first make out what they said. The two sat down at the opposite sides of a table upon which were a number of postcards of the sort described above, a notebook such as grocers use for their accounts and an indelible lead pencil beside it.

INFORMER UNDER FIRE. Abbatemaggio Defends the Carbineer and Exposes More Camorra Crime.

Special Cable Despatch to THE SON.
VITERBO, March 30.—Gennaro Abbatemaggio, the chief informer, was placed on the stand again this morning in the trial of the Camorrists for the murder of Gennaro Cuoccolo. He was again crossexamined by Caviliere Bianchi, the president of the court. The informer again explained why he had not denounced Gio-Cummins or the Cummins syndicate on the strength of Cummins's ability to swing treasurer of the Camorra and the prisoner who is accused of insisting upon the murder of both Cuoccolo and his wife and of having paid $200 to the assassins, at the beginning of his story.

Abbatemaggio confirmed the story of uoccolo's ring having been found in the mattress of the paramour of Giuseppe that Cummins could deliver the goods Salvi, one of the alleged actual murderers. He denied that he had attempted to black mail Enrico Alfano, the head of the Camorra, through his knowledge of the He also denied that he had purchased a ring identical with that worn by Cuoccolo in order to manufacture evidence against the prisoners.

Abbatemaggio denied that the carb City Chamberlain hadn't deposited $50,000 had not bribed him, he declared. They had merely paid his travelling expenses and occasionally gave him small subsi dies. During his examination Abbatemaggio furnished further particulars of the Camorra. He said he was promoted to be a Camorrist because he committed a crime the nature of which he refused to

A report has reached here from Naples before the Grand Jury yesterday after to the effect that a police officer there has $50,000 on condition that the Savoy would lend him that amount, and that they did give Cummins $50,000 on September 9. The day after the $50,000 was checked in by the City Chamberlain, Mr. Poley was called to tell what he knew about the circumstances of the loan.

Although he wished to be frank, apparently, the vice-president of the Savoy hesitated at first over the very direct questions that were put to him. He was brought to admit, however, that the $50,000 turned over to Cummins on September 9 was the identical money received from the City Chamberlain's office, and that, the Savoy Trust Company was not obliged to divert any of its previously held casia.

Questioned further Mr. Fogel said that, Cummins wouldn't have been able to get a loan from the Savoy if the City Chamberlain hadn't first deposited with the Savoy the amount Cummins wanted. Then he went a step further and said that the loan was the direct outcome of the city deposit. The Savoy, he said, wasn't obliging Cummins merely on account of that $50,000 but because it honed to get more city deposits. ment that the whole court was convulsed the entire question was one involving

SEEK MONOPOLY OF THE AIR

FRENCH OFFICIAL'S VIEW OF THE WRIGHT PATENT SUIT.

State's Attorney Admits Validity of Claim of 1904—Argues That French Designers Have Not Infringed on Chief Devices-The First Men to Fly.

Special Cable Despatch to THE SUN PARIS, March 30 .- The trial of the suit of the Wright brothers against a number of French aeroplane manufacturers for day before the Third Civil Tribunal. The State's Attorney made an address which lasted three hours.

He argued that the French company which owned the Wright patents was trying to monopolize flying. He admitted, however, that the Wright patent of 1904 was valid. This is the patent which covers the simultaneous working meetings dress d as a laymen. He also and twisting of the planes and moving the rudder.

The State's attorney began his argu ment by regretting that those wao had preceded him had made it seem that the merits of American and French constructors, whereas justice was not concerned with the fact that the Wright brothers were Americans. He himself emphasized the fact that the Wrights were the first fliers, and that after them something was changed; men had found wings."

Continuing he pointed out that the by documents that contained a complete description of an aeroplane. Now the complaining society or company was only claiming infringement on one point, namely, "the gauchissement" or twisting wings, and this in the opinion of the State's attorney showed that the partners were trying to protect a principle and not merely the means by which that principle was employed.

He thought that French aviators might very well confess that they had not achieved the actual power of flight before the Wrights' visits to this country in 1968. but in consideration of the brilliant achievements made since by their own means they might rest content. He admitted that the use of the Wright balaneing contrivance, which was patented in 1904, would be an infringement, but the French aviators, he insisted, had not used it, so there had been no infringement as a whole within the law.

Then he took up for consideration the question of partial infringement if there nad been any. He divided the machines seized at the aeronautic salon in 1909 into two groups. In the first group he placed the Farman, the Clement Bayard and three other machines which were without the twisted wings but which obtained the same effect by small added wings that certainly did not in his opinion constitute an infringement of the Wright

Turning to the second group, which included the Blériot, the Antoinette and the Santos-Dumont types, he said that undoubtedly they had twisted wings, but he proceeded to argue at great length that the Aders patent, which was issued in 1890, anticipated the Wright design so far as the twisted wing was concerned. He dismissed as immaterial the plea that the designs for the Wright machine had been divulged before the patent was taken out. He also waved aside the plea that the provisions of the French law had not been fulfilled, because the machines had not been in use here for three years after the patents had been granted, in consideration of the fact that the Wrights had been negotiating with the French War Office to sell to the army the exclusive rights. This served as an excuse for the non-exploitation of the machines
